SILKWINGS

Description: SilkWing dragonets are born wingless, but go through a metamorphosis at age six, when they develop four huge wings and silk-spinning abilities; as beautiful and gentle as butterflies, with scales in any color under the sun, except black

Abilities: can spin silk from glands on their wrists to create webs or other woven articles; can detect vibrations with their antennae to assess threats; some are born with “flamesilk,” an ability to spin threads of fire

Acetic and Snowflake flew down to the entrance of the grotto. Inside, he knew, it would be warmer than he liked, heated by the bodies of the fire-breathing NightWings and also by the gift of diplomacy (Cruelty is an ancient survival instinct about fifty years ago, shared by his overfed brain, he had studied every animal gift in careful detail, trying to come up with something new and original for his own. Which was perhaps why he didn't have room in his brain for the faces of dragons he barely knew.) The dome itself was not an animal gift, though; these blocks of ice had been carved by ordinary IceWing talent. It must have taken ages, and he wasn't entirely convinced that it wouldn't all melt on top of some fire-breathing guest one day.

Maybe I could improve the dome as my gift, he thought. An indispensable welcome done for any ally or guest from other tribes. He dismissed the thought almost as soon as he had it. It was derivative and not nearly as impressive as he wanted it to be. He wanted his gift to be one that IceWings would marvel about for centuries after he was gone—something like Frostbite's gift of light.

They landed with a crunch on the snow, but just as they were about to enter the tunnel into the dome, a dragon came charging out.

"Sorry!" the crit blurted out as she narrowly avoided knocking them over. "I just needed to be
