Sentinels: Keepers of the Forest

Kate O'Hearn, Johanna Tarkela

Forest? Would the missing sentinel make a difference? And the sentinels were to remain in the Dark Forest after the call. What was going to happen to them?

"It will be all right," Nearly said softly. "As long as we're together, we'll be fine."

"You're right," Ram finished. "We stick together, no matter what."

The parade of animals entered the Dark Forest. None of the others appeared to notice the change, but Ram and Nearly did. It was completely different. For them, the moment they crossed the threshold, they knew they were in a very special place.

The air was somehow sweeter, as though filled with summer flowers, and it was much warmer. The tree trunks were more vibrant in color. Large stones dotted the area, and each one had multicolored moss growing on it. There were insects the likes of which Ram had never seen before. The blinding was almost overpowering.

Ram stopped and gazed around. "It's beautiful."

"And unbelievable," Nearly said, turning in circles, trying to take it all in.

Bramble and Shortnose were close by, and both stared at them in confusion. "What are you talking about?" Bramble said. "It looks the same. Just trees."

"And rocks," Shortnose added.

"Can't you see it or smell it?" Ram said. "All the colors everywhere, and the air smells so sweet I could eat it."

One of the stinks came closer. "Please tell us everything that you see. It looks the same to me."

As Ram and Nearly described all the wonders they were experiencing, Lightfoot nodded. "My father once told me that his father's mother had been here, and he described how the sentinels had seen things they couldn't. I now know it's all true."
